AMY KOLAN

Professor of Physics

Amy Kolan was born in upstate New York, but lived in Nevada, West Virginia, and Virginia, before moving to Maryland in seventh grade. The daughter of a cement chemist, some of her earliest memories are of playing with an adding machine in her father's laboratory, finding prime numbers on long car rides, and skiing at the two-acre downhill ski area owned by her family.

Kolan earned a B.A. in physics at Dartmouth College, graduating summa cum laude. Dartmouth at that time was a hub of computational exploration, and one of the few institutions of higher learning with an interactive computing environment. This stimulating environment gave her an enduring fascination with algorithms, numerical simulations, and the interplay between discovery and computation.

During her years at Duke University, where she completed her Ph.D. in physics, Kolan took advantage of every opportunity to teach. Her passion for teaching resulted in being named a Fritz London Lecturer; this honor allowed her to teach her own classes, including a senior level course in thermodynamics, during her last year at Duke.

In 1982, after finishing her Ph.D., Kolan accepted a position with the physics faculty at St. Olaf College. Since then, she has taught courses on a variety of topics — from the physics of photography to statistical mechanics — as well to a variety of ages — from “Challenge Math” with 5th graders, to a University of Chicago summer program in number theory for high school students, to an Elderhostel program about atmospheric optics for senior citizens.

A crucial point in her scholarly development occurred during her first sabbatical when she worked with Leo Kadanoff at the University of Chicago on both research and teaching. That sabbatical was a magical time working with a group of people on forefront topics at the intersection of physics, mathematics, and computer science. In addition to research, Kolan had the opportunity to further develop Kadanoff's then new “Chaos and Computing” course in a team-teaching scenario. In this course students wrote short programs to study various physical and mathematical phenomena. The use of short, often numerically-based projects, with a focus on directing students to their own scholarly questions, became a signature of Kolan's later teaching.

Kolan's scholarly work has been as wide ranging as her teaching interests. She has published papers on soap-water systems, mathematical billiards, a simple parking lot model for adhesion, sandpile avalanches, and the fractal nature of systems near a phase transition. Most recently she has become enamored with the use of high-speed video in fluid systems.

Kolan has lived with her husband Craig Feathers in Northfield for the past 39 years and has two daughters. She enjoys bicycling, cross-country skiing, birdwatching, gardening, and playing with her two granddaughters.
